Edinburgh Review for March, 1817.--In the number of works selected for the review, is an article entitled "Interesting Facts relating to the fall and death of Joachim Murat, King of Naples," &c. by Francis Macirone, late aid-de-camp to king Joachim: & a highly interesting extract is given, with the following introduction by the reviewers:

The most interesting part of the tract before us consists of the adventures of Murat, after his ill-advised operations in the north of Italy had failed, and he had been obliged to save himself by a precipitate retreat upon Naples with the scanty remains of his army. There is nothing in ancient war, or the romance of dark ages, more entertaining than the story of his escape to France: his concealment at Marseilles; his subsequent flight to Corsica; and the wild attempt in which he lost his life. We confess that we feel much less interest in the fortunes of this man than M. Macirone, who openly and honestly avows both his esteem for one with whom he had served, and his gratitude to him as a benefactor. Regarding him as a mere soldier of the French school; a man brought up in the contempt alike of death and of civil duties; whose only merit was great courage, accompanied with the virtues of frankness and generosity, which a thoughtless spirit stamps upon characters otherwise sufficiently dark; one in short of that class of military adventurers, who have retarded the improvement of mankind, and inflicted upon their own generation incalculable evils.---it is impossible for us to feel any portion of the warmth towards his person, or the regret for his fate, which in M. Macirone may be both natural and becoming. But every one must be interested with the story of his adventures: which are here related with a great air of truth and authority. The following extract will convey to the reader part of the entertainment we have derived from the perusal of this narrative. Murat, by accident, lost the opportunity of escape from Marseilles in a vessel which he had freighted, and in which he had embarked his suite and his property, which, in this way, went out to sea without him.

"Fortunately for king Joachim, it occurred to him that it might be imprudent to return to the place of refuge which he had just quitted: had it been otherwise, he would inevitably have perished; for at that moment the bloodhounds who pursued him were in the act of visiting the very spot.

"He bent his steps whither chance directed him; carefully avoiding the vicinity of the forts, or of any large dwelling, lest the first house he approached might prove to be the habitation of the enemy. He wandered about the woods and vineyards for several days and nights, with scarcely any sustenance, and without shelter. At length, compelled by weariness and hunger, he determined to enter into a farm-house, where he flattered himself he might not be known.

"He found only an old woman in the house, and informed her that he was an officer belonging to the garrison of Toulon; that he had been taking a long walk across the country; that he had lost his way, and had no dinner; he therefore, begged her to prepare him something to eat. The good old woman, in the most courteous manner, and with the greatest cheerfulness, assured him, that he was a welcome guest, and that he might depend upon being instantly provided with the best fare her dear master's house could furnish. This mention of her "dear master," not a little alarmed the king, who immediately inquired his name, and if she expected him soon home. She satisfied his curiosity, adding, that he was only gone out for a walk. The good woman, during this conversation, employed herself in preparing an omelet; but before she had finished either cooking, or her story, her master returned.

"The king disguised the uneasiness he felt in this gentleman's company, who, however, very civilly bade him welcome, and seated himself at the table prepared for the king,—at the same time desiring the old woman to make ready another omelet for himself. The king, who, as may well be supposed, was extremely hungry, had begun his meal previous to the declaration of his host that, he would join him.

"No one who had ever beheld the stately figure and affable countenance of king Joachim, could forget him; and our host, who, though he had never seen him, had yet seen his portrait in the Marshal's Saloon at the Thuilleries, as well as on his own coins of the grand Duchy of Berg, and the kingdom of Naples,—and had also heard of his being then in the vicinity, as well as of the persecution to which he had been subjected, soon recognised in his guest the person of the king—when, starting from his seat with every mark of the most profound respect, with tears in his eyes, he begged the king to pardon the familiarity into which he had been betrayed; assuring him, that he would readily risk his life to preserve him, and that his house, his fortune, and his person, were all at the king's disposal. At this moment, the old nurse, who was assiduously engaged at the fire, hearing the master's respectful & passionate address, from which she learnt the rank of the personage for whom she had been exercising her culinary skill, was seized with an universal tremor; and in throwing herself at the king's feet, overturned the frying pan and its contents into the fire.

"The king remained concealed in the house of this worthy gentleman for several days, when some circumstance made it necessary that he should be removed. Another country house was provided, which was then unoccupied; and a naval officer, whose name I shall not mention, was intrusted with the secret. An old woman, whose fidelity could be depended upon, was left in the house to wait upon the king while the naval officer, and an associate named——, were employed in occasionally attending upon his person, in bringing him necessaries & refreshments from the neighbouring town, and in guarding against any circumstance which might menace the king's safety.

"In the mean time king Joachim's enemies by no means relaxed in their exertions to take him. The report of his having gold and jewels to an immense amount about his person, not a little contributed to increase their activity. The good old woman, who was employed to wait on the king, was indefatigable in her attention. She constantly kept watch during the night, while the king reposed, and would never retire to rest but in the middle of the day, when there was no danger of surprise; his faithful companions generally slept in the town to avoid observation.

"It would appear, however, that something had led to a suspicion of the king's retreat; for, at mid-night, on the 13th of August, a party of 60 men, headed by one Mocau, son of the general of that name, repaired to the villa in which the king was concealed. The house being placed upon an eminence, it would have been difficult to approach it in the day, without discovery; but, aided as this party was by the darkness of the night, they made quite sure of taking their victim by surprise, which must inevitably have happened if these imprudent assassins had not provided themselves with a lantern. The old dame, who was most fortunately watching at a window that looked towards the path which the ruffians were ascending, was alarmed at the appearance of the light; and, immediately awaking the king, who was sleeping in his clothes with his arms beside him, apprized him of his danger. He instantly covered himself with his great coat, seized his poniard and two pair of holster pistols, slipped out at a back door, and concealed himself under the thick foliage of the vines, at about 30 yards distance from the house.—The old woman fastened the door after him, whilst the gang surrounded the house. She had the presence of mind to make some delay in opening the door, under the pretence of requiring time to dress herself. In a few moments she disposed of the king's mattress, and set all to rights. This privileged banditti examined every corner of the house, and a party extended their search to the garden and vineyards; in doing which, the king heard several of them pass within a few paces of him, expressing their wish that they might find him, to enjoy the pleasure of cutting him to pieces, and dividing his spoils; but after an unsuccessful search they left the house. The king afterwards informed me that it was his intention, in case he had been discovered, to kill as mano of his assassins as he could; and then, rather than suffer himself to be taken alive to discharge his last pistol at his own head."

GENERAL ST. CLAIR.
From General Wilkinson's Memoirs

"I remained with the brigade on Mount Independence, until the beginning of September, when Brigadier-general de Roche Fer noy took command of it, and I was transferred to that able but unfortunate officer, General St. Clair, to whose instruction I am much indebted for my principles of service and knowledge of details. He had been introduced into the Royal American or 60th British Regiment, and during the seven years war, had seen a great deal of active service under distinguished commanders. He served at the taking of Louisburg under Gen. Amherst and the next campaign carried a pair of colours on the plains of Abraham, the day Gen. Wolfe bartered his life for deathless renown.---The native ingenuity, liberal education, literary taste, and polished address of Ensign St. Clair, could not escape the observation of the conqueror of Canada, and his able co-adjutors, Moncton, Townsend and Murray; and the circumstance of their attentions enlarged the sphere of his information, and gave scope to his genius and dispositions. After the peace of '63 he sold out and entered into trade, for which the generosity of his nature utterly disqualified him; he, of course, soon became disgusted with a profitless pursuit, and having married, after several vicissitudes of fortune, he located himself in Ligonier valley, west of Allegheny mountain, and near the ancient route from Philadelphia to Pittsburg. In this situation the American revolution found him surrounded by a rising family, in the enjoyment of ease & independence, with the fairest prospects of affluent fortune, the foundation of which had been already established by his intelligence, industry and enterprise. From this peaceful abode, these sweet domestic enjoyments, and the flattering prospects which accompanied them, he was drawn by the claims of a troubled country. A man to have been a military officer, and distinguished for knowledge and integrity, could not, in those times be concealed even by his favorite mountains, and therefore without application or expectation on his part, he received the commission of a colonel, in the month of December 1775, together with a letter from President Hancock, pressing him to repair immediately to Philadelphia. He obeyed the summons, and took leave, not only of his wife and children, but in effect of his fortune, to embark in the cause of liberty and the united colonies. In six weeks he completed the levy of a regim of 750 men; six companies of which ma ed in season, to join our troops before Q bec; he followed with the other fou May; and after the unlucky affair of T Rivers, by his counsel to Gen. Sulliva Sorel he saved the army we had in Ca da. Subsequently to these events, he to the rank of major-general, and was f oured with the confidence and friendshi Gen. Washinton to the day of his de At Trenton, he saved the army by the m movement to the right, which he rec mended in council on the night of th Jan. 1777; and at Ticonderoga, in same year, I beheld him rising superio the selfish obligations which fetter kind; and by preferring the safety of army confided to his charge, to the bl honours which were within his reach voluntarily plunged himself into the gu popular detraction. Well do I remem his reply to me, when deploring the ne sity of retreat: "It must be so, my 'Tis not in mortals to command succ but we'll do more, we will deserve it know I could save my character by sac cing the army; but were I to do so, I sh forfeit that which the world could not store, and which it cannot take away, approbation of my own conscience." W a noble sentiment! Can such services sacrifices be balanced by PELF? And meet that such a patriot should be suff to drag out a tedious term of old age i digence, and be buried in obscurity? such daring neglects comport with the erality and beneficence of an enligh Christian people? Are they consi with justice and sound policy? Re and humanity revolt against these p sitions! and it is hoped that the virtue good sense of the people, which when s taneously exerted seldom err, may b tively interposed to rescue the co from the sin of ingratitude, and the sh of neglecting those citizens whose w time has been devoted to the public vice."

PITTSBURGH.

FRIDAY OCTOBER 10, 1817.

DIED, on his way from New-Orleans' Mr. William Watson, son of Andrew Watson, Esquire, and at New-Orleans, of the Yellow fever, Mr. James Johnston, merchant, & Mr. John Points, all of this place; Mr. James Smith, merchant, formerly of this city, and Mr. Andrew Jack, of this vicinity.

The first Election in the New State of Mississippi took place in the first week of September. David Holmes is elected Governor of the State, and George Poindexter Representative to Congress. There appears to have been no opposition to either of these gentlemen.

The Hon. John Quincey Adams, has officially notified the foreign ministers resident in this country, that he has entered upon the duties of his office of Secretary of State; and is ready to receive from them such communications as they may think proper to address to him.

Spanish Outrage.—Mr. Auguste Choteau, has arrived, to the great joy of his family, and the general satisfaction of his fellow citizens. We have heard but the outlines of his disaster. It appears that the Spaniards crossed the rocky mountains and seized Mr. Choteau and his hunters, in the American Territory. They were conveyed to Santa Fee, and loaded with irons, in which humiliating and painful situation, they remained several days. Fortunately for the party, a Catholic priest, who had some acquaintance with Mr. Choteau's family, discovered their situation, and had sufficient influence to have them relieved from their irons. They continued in confinement 46 days.

Mr. Choteau will probably forward to government, a full account of the affair; and there can be no doubt, that proper atonement will be demanded for the insulting robbery. St. Louis Enq.

It is stated in the Ulster Gazette, that at the late Circuit Court in Dutchess county a verdict of two hundred and seventy dollars was found against a Justice of the peace, for trying a cause wherein he had no jurisdiction.

NORFOLK, Sept. 26.

On Wednesday last arrived in Lynn haven Bay, the United States frigate Congress, Charles Morris, Esq. commander, from a cruize on the coast of South America. The Congress, after leaving Cape Henry, (Hayti) cruized along the Main, touching at Margaritta, Cumana, Barcelona, and lately at Laguira, from whence she sailed for the United States, and arrived as before stated in a passage of 18 days. The Congress will put into this port.

We have not been able to obtain the particulars of her cruize for this morning's paper. From a gentleman who came up from her yesterday, however, we have collected the foregoing, and also learn, that there had been a hard fought and bloody engagement between the Spaniards under Morillo and the patriots under Gomez, at Assumption, in the Island of Margaritta. Morillo had previously taken Pompater and another small place, and Gomez had retreated to Assumption, where he was attacked by the royalists, and defeated them with great slaughter, driving Morillo to his shipping, in which he embarked with the wreck of his army, and sailed for Laguira, where he arrived a few days before the Congress sailed, and marched immediately for Caraccas. We give this as an imperfect sketch, calculating on receiving a more detailed and correct statement in time for our next.

Since writing the above, the Congress has come up and anchored in the bite of Craney Island.

We hear that a gentleman has lately arrived in this metropolis, who crossed the continent of America from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean. He left the settlement at Columbia river, which empties into the South Sea in lat. 46 13, and lon. 236 34, in the month of April last, and penetrating the forests in nearly McKenzie's route, arrived at some of the hunting settlements of the English N. Western Company, in the course of a little more than three months. Thence he came through Canada to Boston. We have not learned any particulars of events of interest which took place during the journey. Bost. In.

From the Richmond Enquirer.

It is with much concern we learn from a passenger from the South, that the gallant THORNTON POSEY, late Colonel in the U. S. Army, and recently a Colonel in the Patriot Army under Gen. M'Gregor, breathed his last at Wilmington, N. C. on Wednesday week. He reached that harbour in a vessel from Amelia Island, in company with the gallant friend who shared the toils of the expidition. He had symptoms of the bilious fever, when he embarked, which proved too violent for his naturally strong constitution.

Much of the success which attended this expedition, was owing to Posey's exertions; his generous and gallant soul would have been proud to have led the banners of liberty into an enslaved land; but when he found the means were insufficient for any great purpose; that a bold military expidition was about to degenerate into a privateering system, he and his Virginia friend threw up their commissions, and bade adieu to Amelia Island. He has now sunk into the grave, where neither the voice of liberty nor glory can reach him; but over his silent sod is poured the sigh of every man who sets a value upon gallantry, generosity, and noble daring.

It is said that Gen M'Gregor is about to re-visit South America.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.

Albany, Wesmoreland Cy. Va. Sep. 11.

Messrs. Green & Harrow,

A little son of mine, about six years old whose eyes have been blue from his birth, until Tuesday the 4th inst. about 12 o'clock on that day, as well as we could judge of the time, the right eye suddenly changed its colour, and become as black as ever I saw one; the other retained its original colour.

The child was in good health at the time this circumstance took place, and continues so. In the morning of the following day, the blackness began to disappear gradually and by twelve o'clock on that day, the eye had resumed its original colour which it retains to the present day; the sight has not been impaired in the slightest degree.

How to account for this, to me, very extraordinary phenomenon, I know not; when it was discovered, the child was looking at a walnut tree, from which some persons were threshing walnuts.

If you think this circumstance worthy of notice, you may make it known to the learned faculty and to the world. Your friend.

JOHN MILLER.

A wire bridge for foot passengers, after the models of those constructed in America, which are so servicable in crossing ravines, small lakes, &c. in that country, has just been erected across the Gala, at Galashiels, North Britain, and is found to answer the purpose extremely well, and to every appearance may last many years at little or no expence. The span which is 111 feet, and the breadth, three feet, makes it very light and neat in appearance, though with safety, 20 or 30 people may be upon it at a time. The whole expence of this useful little bridge, is only 2l.

In a small yew tree in the garden of Mr. Samuel Warburton, of Suffield, a wren, a linnet, and a blackbird, have all built their respective nests. These little musical tenants of the tree live in perfect harmony together, and according to the fashion of the times pay their rent to Mr. W. in notes.

FALL PLOUGHING.

A Raleigh, (N. C.) paper recommends fall ploughing to be an invaluable preparative for a corn crop the next year. The stalks and roots of clover, grass or weeds, by being ploughed under, form during the winter, an excellent manure. Ploughing the ground in high ridges is found to be best, especially in wet or clay soil. The earth by being thus ploughed in deep furroughs and more exposed to the air, not only improves in goodness, but becomes dry much sooner in spring. This preparation also makes a great saving in hoeing the corn—the roots becoming rotten, the ground light and free from weeds. The ploughing of ground in the fall also exposes the ball containing the eggs of the corn grub or black worm, so that they are either destroyed by the sun or the birds.

The practice of fall ploughing is becoming pretty general in Pennsylvania, and it is remarked that the crops of corn are vastly greater than produced by spring ploughing. The ploughing of this ground may be put off if necessary, until the other business of the fall is finished—At any time before the earth is locked up by frost will answer.

An honest Hybernian, whose bank pocket (in his own words) had stopped payment, was forced to the said necessity of perambulating the streets of Manchester two nights together, for want of a few pence to pay his lodging, when accidentally hearing a person talk of the lying in ho-pital, he exclaims, "That's the place for me, where is it? for by St. Patrick I've been lying out these two nights.
